Living With Silva-Trevino

By Norton Tooby and Dan Kesselbrenner

Introduction. On November 7, 2008, only two months before leaving office, Attorney General Mukasey decided Matter of Silva-Trevino, 24 I. & N. Dec. 687 (A.G. November 7, 2008), in which he greatly modified the analysis used to determine whether a given conviction constitutes a crime of moral turpitude (CMT) for removal purposes, if, indeed, he did not virtually scrap 100 years of thoughtful jurisprudence altogether. This decision also uses different language to define the term "crime of moral turpitude," although it is not clear whether the definition has significantly changed.

A number of descriptions of this important decision have been published. Counsel for Mr. Silva-Trevino filed a motion for reconsideration, supported by an amicus curiae brief, raising many powerful arguments why this decision should be vacated and

1 (c) Norton Tooby and National Immigration Project of the National Lawyers Guild 2009. Research was completed on this version of this article on April 27, 2009. All rights reserved. This article is a collective effort, based as it is on a number of conversations as well as on the collective wisdom expressed on the internet. Our thanks especially go to Joseph Justin Rollin, Portland, Oregon, and Kathy Brady, Senior Attorney, Immigrant Legal Resource Center, San Francisco, California. Portions were derived from N. TOOBY, J. ROLLIN & J. FOSTER, CRIMES OF MORAL TURPITUDE (2008).
2 Norton Tooby, of Oakland, California, specializes in criminal defense of immigrants and has written TOOBY'S GUIDE TO CRIMINAL IMMIGRATION LAW (2008); TOOBY'S CRIMES OF MORAL TURPITUDE (2008); CRIMINAL DEFENSE OF IMMIGRANTS (4th ed. 2007), and SAFE HAVENS: HOW TO IDENTIFY AND CONSTRUCT NON-DEPORTABLE CONVICTIONS (2005), and maintains www.NortonTooby.com.
3 Dan Kesselbrenner is the Executive Director of the National Immigration Project of the National Lawyers Guild, the coauthor of IMMIGRATION LAW AND CRIMES (2009), and a Clinical Visiting Lecturer in Law at Yale Law School.
the case reconsidered. The Attorney General denied this motion on January 15, 2009, a few days before leaving office. An additional motion for reconsideration has been filed, this time before incoming Attorney General Eric Holder, but it has not yet been decided. These motions provide an excellent checklist of objections to the Silva-Trevino analysis that counsel can raise[] in immigration proceedings and petitions for review. Every circuit, except the Seventh,7 has held the traditional categorical analysis applies to determining whether a conviction constitutes a CMT, and Silva-Trevino may therefore have little or no impact at the end of the day. The Second Circuit has already rejected a similar effort by the BIA to modify the categorical analysis,8 and other circuits may well follow suit, especially in view of the strength of the arguments against Silva-Trevino made in the motions for reconsideration mentioned above.

What do we do in the meantime? What has so far received less attention is the question: How can immigration counsel best represent immigrants in removal proceedings involving alleged crimes of moral turpitude under Silva-Trevino? What do we do before an Immigration Judge or BIA that feels bound to abide by Silva-Trevino? That is the subject of this article.

Granted Silva-Trevino contains language damaging to respondent's chances of persuading an immigration judge that a given conviction is not a CMT. Granted that the Attorney General’s analysis is not even-handed and is often quite inconsistent with the very methodology he describes. The methodology that he says he is using, however, leaves more arguments open to respondents than might at first appear. This article outlines how to interpret Silva-Trevino so that it will minimize damaging consequences to respondents and undercut the government’s ability to establish that a given conviction is a CMT, while remaining faithful to what the former Attorney General says he is doing.

Summary. The Attorney General outlined the new CMT analysis as follows:

In short, to determine whether an alien's prior conviction triggers application of the Act's moral turpitude provisions, adjudicators should: (1) look first to the statute of conviction under the categorical inquiry set forth in this opinion and recently applied by the Supreme Court in Duenas-Alvarez; (2) if the categorical inquiry does not resolve the question, look to the alien's record of conviction, including documents such as the indictment, the judgment of conviction, jury instructions, a signed guilty plea, and the plea transcript; and (3) if the record of conviction does not resolve the inquiry, consider any additional evidence the adjudicator determines is necessary or appropriate to resolve accurately the moral turpitude question.

(Silva-Trevino, supra, at 704.)

7 Ali v. Mukasey, 521 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. Apr. 4, 2008) (neither the Taylor categorical analysis, nor the limitation to the record of conviction for determining the nature of a conviction for immigration purposes, strictly applies to the determination of whether a conviction is a crime involving moral turpitude).
8 Gertsenscheyn v. USDOJ, 544 F.3d 137 (2d Cir. Sept. 25, 2008).
The BIA recently summarized Matter of Silva-Trevino's categorical analysis of whether a conviction constituted a crime of moral turpitude as follows:

Additionally, during the pendency of this appeal, the Attorney General issued a comprehensive decision clarifying the concept of moral turpitude and articulating a methodology for determining whether a particular offense is a crime involving moral turpitude. Matter of Silva-Trevino, 24 I&N Dec. 687 (A.G. 2008). According to the Attorney General, a crime involving moral turpitude involves reprehensible conduct committed with some degree of scienter, either specific intent, deliberateness, willfulness, or recklessness. Id. at 706 & n.5.

In considering whether a particular offense constitutes a crime involving moral turpitude, we must first engage in the traditional categorical analysis of the elements of the statute. See Gonzales v. Duenas-Alvarez, 549 U.S. 183, 186 (2007) (citing Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575, 599-600 (1990), as stating that in determining whether a particular conviction is for a certain type of offense, a court should normally look “not to the facts of the particular prior case,” but rather to the statute defining the crime of conviction). In Matter of Silva-Trevino, supra, the Attorney General found that the “categorical inquiry” also requires an examination of the law of the convicting jurisdiction to determine whether there is a “‘realistic probability,’” as opposed to a “‘theoretical possibility,’” that the statute under which the alien was convicted would be applied to reach conduct that does not involve moral turpitude. Id. at 698 (quoting Gonzales v. Duenas-Alvarez, supra, at 193). This requires asking whether, at the time of the alien's removal proceedings, any actual (as opposed to hypothetical) case exists in which the relevant criminal statute was applied to conduct that did not involve moral turpitude. If the statute has not been so applied in any actual case, the Immigration Judge, in applying the “realistic probability” method, may reasonably conclude that all convictions under the statute may categorically be treated as ones involving moral turpitude.

Should the language of the criminal statute encompass both conduct that involves moral turpitude and conduct that does not, however, and there is a case in which the relevant criminal statute has been applied to the latter category of conduct, the Immigration Judge cannot categorically treat all convictions under that statute as convictions for crimes that involve moral turpitude. Matter of Silva-Trevino, supra, at 697. Should such an inquiry reveal that there is, in fact, a realistic probability that the statute would reach offenses that are not turpitudinous, we must then engage in a “modified categorical inquiry” in which we examine the record of conviction, including documents such as the indictment, the judgment of conviction, jury instructions, a signed guilty plea, and the plea transcript, in order to determine whether the particular conviction in question was for a morally turpitudinous offense. Id. at 698-99. Finally, if consideration of the conviction record does not reveal whether the alien's particular offense involved moral turpitude, we may then consider any other admissible evidence bearing on that question. Id. at 699-704.

Under Silva-Trevino, analysis of a CMT conviction involves up to three steps. Step One is the traditional categorical analysis of the elements, with the added requirement that respondent must establish a reasonable probability that the criminal statute of conviction has indeed been applied in a factual situation that does not constitute a CMT.9 If Step One gives an unambiguous answer to the CMT question, one way or the other, the analysis ends there.10 If not, analysis proceeds to Step Two: the examination of the traditional record of conviction documents, to see whether they contain "facts" that bring the conviction within the CMT definition. If Step Two gives an unambiguous answer, one way or the other, the analysis stops there. If the CMT question is still open, the adjudicator proceeds to Step Three in which the Immigration Judge may consider any reliable evidence s/he feels is necessary and appropriate to see whether the offense conflict involved moral turpitude.

Limitation to Crime of Moral Turpitude Cases. The Attorney General specifically limited this new decision to CMT cases: "This opinion does not, of course, extend beyond the moral turpitude issue—an issue that justifies a departure from the Taylor/Shepard framework because moral turpitude is a non-element aggravating factor that 'stands apart from the elements of the [underlying criminal] offense.' Ali, 521 F.3d at 743." (Silva-Trevino, supra, at 704.) This new analysis therefore cannot be applied to convictions of aggravated felonies, crimes of domestic violence, firearms cases,

---

9 There is also a question whether the former Attorney General has preserved or abandoned the minimum conduct test of the categorical analysis in Step One. See Minimum Conduct Test, infra.
10 "If an immigration judge determines, based on application of the reasonable probability approach, that a prior conviction is categorically a crime involving moral turpitude, there is no reason to proceed to a second stage. The same would be true if the immigration judge were able to determine at the first stage that a prior conviction categorically was not a crime involving moral turpitude – i.e., if none of the circumstances in which there is a reasonable probability of conviction involves moral turpitude." (Silva-Trevino, supra, at 699 n.2.) See also id. at 708: "This categorical determination, however, does not end the moral turpitude inquiry. Instead, where, as here, the categorical inquiry does not resolve the moral turpitude question, an adjudicator should engage in a modified categorical inquiry, considering whether the facts of the alien's prior conviction in fact involved moral turpitude."
controlled substances, or any of the twenty-four grounds of deportation – other than the CMT grounds -- that are triggered by a specified criminal conviction.\textsuperscript{11}

\textit{Burden of Proof}. The Attorney General ignores that in \textit{Matter of Becera-Miranda}, 12 I. & N. 358 (BIA 1967), the BIA placed the burden of persuasion on the government to prove that a returning LPR was inadmissible.

In \textit{Chew v. Rogers}, 257 F.2d 607 (DC Cir. 1958), the court said flatly “... if Chew is to be deprived of his status ... the Immigration and Naturalization Service may do so only in proceedings in which the Service is the moving party, and it bears the burden of proof ....” (Emphasis supplied.) This Board has already affirmed its awareness of \textit{Chew v. Rogers} in \textit{Matter of Becera-Miranda}, 12 I&N 358 (BIA 1967).

\textit{Step One: Traditional Categorical Analysis}. The Attorney General's first step is arguably the same old first step, the categorical analysis almost universally used to answer the CMT question for 100 years, with the addition of the reasonable-probability refinement from \textit{Duenas}. (\textit{Silva-Trevino, supra}, at 688.) He specifically adopted the normal categorical analysis used by the Supreme Court recently in \textit{Duenas-Alvarez}.\textsuperscript{12} (\textit{Ibid.} at 704.)

The Step One categorical analysis is an elements-only test, and completely ignores the facts of the case. The Supreme Court explicitly used the traditional categorical analysis: "the lower courts uniformly have applied the approach this Court set forth in \textit{Taylor v. United States}, 495 U.S. 575, 110 S.Ct. 2143, 109 L.Ed.2d 607 (1990)." (\textit{Id.} at 185.) Therefore, all normal categorical analysis and defenses arguably apply to this stage. As usual, the analysis ignores the facts completely. Under this analysis, a court seeking to determine whether a particular prior conviction falls within a ground of removal should normally look to the state statute defining the crime of conviction, "not to the facts of the particular prior case." (\textit{Duenas, supra}, at 186, quoting \textit{Taylor, supra}, at 599-600.)

\textsuperscript{11} See \textsc{N. Tooby \& J. Rollin, Safe Havens: How To Identify and Construct Non-Deportable Convictions} § 2.7 and Appendix A (2005)(listing 24 conviction-based grounds of deportation).

Minimum Conduct Test. The minimum-conduct test also arguably continues to apply, since that is what the Supreme Court used in Taylor, and the Supreme Court applied the Taylor analysis to the removal context in Duenas, which the Attorney General adopted in Silva-Trevino. The Attorney General also listed this as something on which the federal and immigration courts agreed:

There are a few basics on which the Board and the Federal courts have generally agreed. To begin with, they generally agree that in deciding whether an alien's prior criminal conviction constitutes a conviction for a crime involving moral turpitude—that is, whether moral turpitude “necessarily inheres” in a violation of a particular State or Federal criminal statute, Matter of Torres-Varela, 23 I&N Dec. 78, 84 (BIA 2001)—immigration judges and the Board should engage in a “categorical” inquiry and look first to the statute of conviction rather than to the specific facts of the alien's crime.

(Silva-Trevino, supra, at 688; accord, 696 ["The Department and the Federal courts agree that, to determine whether a crime involves moral turpitude, immigration judges should first engage in a “categorical” inquiry and look to the statute of conviction rather than to the specific facts of an alien's crime."])"

As mentioned above, if the Step One analysis results in a conclusion, based on the elements, that a conviction is always a CMT, that ends the inquiry. "The same would be true if the immigration judge were able to determine at the first stage that a prior conviction categorically was not a crime involving moral turpitude – i.e., if none of the circumstances in which there is a reasonable probability of conviction involves moral turpitude." (Silva-Trevino, supra, at 699 n.2.) The third logical possibility – that the Step One analysis does not establish a conviction under the statute is always or never a CMT – allows the adjudicator to move on to Step Two. This is what happened in Silva-Trevino itself. "Because Texas Penal Code § 21.11(a)(1) has been applied to conduct that does not involve moral turpitude (the defendant in Johnson was convicted despite his contention that he had no reason to know that his sexual conduct was directed at a child), respondent's conviction cannot categorically be treated as one that did involve moral turpitude." (Silva-Trevino, supra, at 708.) The adjudicator therefore moves on to Step Two of the Analysis.

In Silva-Trevino's case, however, the Attorney General did not appear to apply the "minimum conduct test" at Step One. Under this test, the minimum conduct that can be penalized under the Texas statute did not involve moral turpitude, since it was in effect a strict liability statute. However, the Attorney General concluded that the Step One analysis did not resolve the CMT question, and proceeded to Step Two. While his language in general adopted the ordinary categorical analysis, including the minimum conduct test, his actual decision in Silva-Trevino ignored the minimum conduct test. Either he was inaccurate in claiming to employ the categorical analysis as used in Taylor v. United States and Duenas, or he erred in applying it in this case by ignoring the minimum conduct part of this analysis. His decision in Silva-Trevino appears to be internally inconsistent, and is itself ambiguous on this point.

Because the question of deportability hangs on this analysis, and because the Attorney General is in effect issuing a regulation that affects these substantial rights, there seems no reason to suppose that the "rule of lenity" would not apply to the Silva-Trevino decision. If so, then the courts should construe this ambiguous portion of Silva-Trevino in favor of respondent, and hold that the Attorney General's analysis is indeed consistent with that of the Supreme Court in Taylor and Duenas, and apply the minimum conduct analysis at Step One.

Step One therefore asks whether the elements of the statute of conviction always or never fall within the definition of crime of moral turpitude. If they always fall within the ground of deportation, then Step One concludes that all convictions under the statute are CMTs. If they never fall within the definition, then the conviction is categorically not a CMT. For example, it is well-established that merely regulatory offenses do not constitute crimes of moral turpitude, because there is nothing inherently wrong with engaging in the particular activity, except that someone has passed a law against it. Silva-Trevino does not alter this rule. "The [reprehensible] definition [of moral turpitude] also faithfully implements the Act's distinction between crimes involving moral turpitude (which trigger specific immigration consequences) and criminal conduct generally (which the Government has a valid interest in punishing whether or not it qualifies as morally offensive or involves scienter) by more clearly articulating the subjective, or intent, element that has long characterized judicial and administrative recognition of crimes involving moral turpitude in the immigration context." (Silva-Trevino, supra, at 689 n.1.)

It is only necessary to proceed to Step Two if Step One does not resolve the inquiry. "Second, where this categorical analysis does not resolve the moral turpitude inquiry in a particular case, an adjudicator should proceed with a “modified categorical” inquiry." (Silva-Trevino, supra, at 690.)

Arguably, the only sense in which the minimum conduct approach has been modified in Silva-Trevino is that after applying it, the adjudicator will apply the additional "reasonable probability" requirement first enunciated in Duenas:

I thus find the analysis in Duenas-Alvarez persuasive and conclude that, in evaluating whether an alien's prior offense is categorically one that involved moral turpitude, immigration judges should determine whether there is a “realistic probability, not a theoretical possibility,” that a State or Federal criminal statute would be applied to reach conduct that does not involve moral turpitude. Duenas-Alvarez, 549 U.S. at 193.

---

The "reasonable probability" requirement is satisfied by a showing that "the criminal statute in issue has at some point been applied to conduct that did not involve moral turpitude . . . ." (Silva-Trevino, supra, at 698.)

This "reasonable probability" test focuses the adjudicator on a criminal statute's actual scope and application and tailors the categorical moral turpitude inquiry by asking whether, at the time of an alien's removal proceeding, any actual (as opposed to hypothetical) case exists in which the relevant criminal statute was applied to conduct that did not involve moral turpitude. Cf. Duenas-Alvarez, 549 U.S. at 193. If the statute has not been so applied in any case (including the alien's own case), the adjudicator can reasonably conclude that all convictions under the statute may categorically be treated as ones involving moral turpitude. In such circumstances, the history of adjudication generally establishes no realistic probability that the statute, whatever its language may hypothetically allow, would actually be applied to acts that do not involve moral turpitude. See id. By contrast, if the language of the criminal statute could encompass both conduct that involves moral turpitude and conduct that does not, and there is a case in which the relevant criminal statute has been applied to the latter category of conduct, the adjudicator cannot categorically treat all convictions under that statute as convictions for crimes that involve moral turpitude. See id. at 185-88, 193.

(Silva-Trevino, supra, at 697.)

The traditional categorical analysis of Taylor and Duenas also contemplates that the elements of the statute of conviction categorically establish that no conviction under the statute constitutes a crime of moral turpitude. In fact, that was the holding in both of those Supreme Court cases.

Silva-Trevino might be read as placing the burden of proof of a reasonable probability on the noncitizen, even in deportation proceedings. "Because such a statute will ordinarily be subject to categorical treatment under the realistic probability approach, it is the alien who must “point to his own case or other cases” in which a person was convicted without proof of the statutory element that evidences moral turpitude." (Id. at 704 n.4.) Immigration counsel, however, should argue that the government in deportation proceedings always bears the burden of proof of every fact necessary to establish the ground of deportation under applicable Supreme Court authority \(^1\) and the statute.\(^2\)

---

The Fifth and Ninth Circuits have taken different approaches to the Duenas reasonable probability issue. On the one hand, the Fifth Circuit appears to take a very narrow view -- requiring the noncitizen or defendant provide either personal evidence (from his or her own case) or case law showing that the statute of conviction reaches conduct that falls outside the definition of the ground of deportation. In United States v. Ramos Sanchez, the court rejected the contention that an indecent solicitation statute at issue was overbroad because it could be used to prosecute a minor. Even though the statute at issue had been used to prosecute a 17-year-old for having sex with his 15-year-old girlfriend, the court found that case inapplicable, since the age of consent in Kansas was 16. The Fifth Circuit has also applied the “ordinary case” test established by the Supreme Court in James v. United States, 550 U.S. 192 (2007). In that case, courts look to whether the hypothetical non-CMT conduct is "ordinarily" punished under the statute.

On the other hand, the Ninth Circuit does not require the noncitizen to provide “specific examples” of a state prosecuting people “for acts that would fall outside the generic definition of crimes of moral turpitude.” Rather the court stated that:

The issue is not whether in some cases violators of section 32 have been involved in a crime of moral turpitude. The issue is whether everyone

---

17 United States v. Ramos-Sanchez, 483 F.3d 400, 404 (5th Cir. Apr. 2, 2007) (“Though it is theoretically possible that Kansas might punish such an act, Ramos-Sanchez points to no evidence of the realistic possibility of such a prosecution.”). See also United States v. Balderas-Rubio, 499 F.3d 470 (5th Cir. Sept. 5, 2007) (although violation of Okla. Stat. tit. 21, § 1123, making it unlawful to “to intentionally look upon, touch, maul, or feel the body or private parts of any child under sixteen (16) years of age in any lewd or lascivious manner ....” could include the act of viewing a child in a lewd manner from a significant distance (using binoculars), and without the knowledge of the child, the defendant “failed to show a realistic probability that [Oklahoma] would in fact punish conduct of the type he describes . . . .”, and the offense is considered “sexual abuse of a minor” for illegal re-entry sentencing purposes).

18 Note that here the court seems to be looking exclusively to prosecution of the law of the state. The court did not consider that 17 years old is below the age of consent in other states, or even that 17 years old is under the age of consent for (at least some) federal purposes. See, e.g., Matter of VFD, 23 I. & N. Dec. 859 (BIA 2006) (for purposes of aggravated felony sexual abuse of a minor, a “minor” is a person who is under the age of 18).

19 See, e.g., Perez-Munoz v. Keisler, 507 F.3d 357 (5th Cir. Nov. 6, 2007) (“Although it may be possible to commit this offense by an intentional act without the use of physical force (such as by placing poison in a child’s food or drink), this is not the ordinary, usual way the crime is committed. The crime, when committed by an act, is usually committed with the use of some force, or at least through conduct that presents the substantial risk that force may be used. The BIA correctly found that Perez had been convicted of an aggravated felony.”).

20 Navarro-Lopez v. Gonales, 503 F.3d 1063, 1072 (9th Cir. Sept. 19, 2007) (en banc) prosecuted under that section has necessarily committed a crime involving moral turpitude. There is nothing inherent in the crime of accessory after the fact that makes it a crime involving moral turpitude in all cases.\(^{21}\)

Likewise, in finding that the California offense of leaving the scene of an accident resulting in bodily injury was not a crime of moral turpitude, the Ninth Circuit found that looking to the statutory language, “a driver in an accident resulting in injury who stops and provides identification, but fails to provide a vehicle registration number, has violated the statute.”\(^{22}\) The court then rejected the DHS’s argument that such an offense would not be prosecuted:

We cannot . . . ignore the plain language of § 20001(a). \textit{Duenas-Alvarez} does caution us against “conjur[ing] up some scenario, however improbable, whereby a defendant might be convicted under the statute in question even though he did not commit the act encompassed by the federal provision.” \textit{United States v. Carson}, 486 F.3d 618, 610 (9th Cir. 2007) \textit{(per curiam)}. But where, as here, the state statute plainly and specifically criminalizes conduct outside the scope of the federal definition, we do not engage in judicial prestidigitation by concluding that the statute “creates a crime outside the generic definition of a listed crime.” \textit{Duenas-Alvarez}, 127 S.Ct. at 822.\(^{23}\)

Other courts may also follow this analysis,\(^{24}\) and counsel outside the Ninth Circuit could argue that the same reasoning should be followed.

Under \textit{Silva-Trevino}, immigration counsel can argue that an offense is not a CMT because the statute of conviction punishes non-CMT conduct. Immigration counsel can prove that there exists a reasonable probability of prosecution, i.e., that a single case that lies outside the CMT definition has in fact been prosecuted, in a variety of ways:

1. A reported decision under the statute.
2. An unreported decision under the statute.
3. The defendant's own case.

\(^{21}\)\textit{Ibid.}
\(^{23}\)\textit{Ibid.}
\(^{24}\)See, e.g., \textit{Wala v. Mukasey}, 511 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. Dec. 12, 2007) (“However improbable, Wala could have been taking the jewelry with the intent to loan it to his girlfriend for one “night on the town” and then return it. Or, he could have been taking the credit cards with the intent to use them for a one-time identification purpose. The point is that either would have been sufficient to sustain Wala's guilty plea and conviction under Connecticut penal law. Thus, although it may have been reasonable for the BIA to infer that Wala intended permanently to keep the items he admitted taking, the modified categorical approach does not permit the BIA to draw inferences of this kind.”).
(4) Any other case, proven by the declaration of defense counsel or anyone else. Criminal defense listservs may be used to announce the search for a specific case, and to obtain a declaration from defense counsel in that case.

(5) Form jury instructions should also be acceptable. For example, if an auto theft [statute] instruction informs the jury that the defendant must be found guilty of unauthorized driving no matter for how short a distance or period of time, that sufficiently establishes a reasonable probability of prosecution because the courts were anticipating actual cases in which the jury needed guidance on this point.

Advice for Criminal Defense Counsel. While the subject of this article is representation before an immigration judge, a word about advising criminal defense counsel in the criminal case is in order. Immigration counsel should [suggest they] seek a plea to a "safe haven" offense that cannot constitute a CMT under the elements test, such as spitting on the sidewalk, or any other offense that cannot be said to be reprehensible on the elements, nor even to include reprehensible conduct. The offense selected should not be a divisible offense, but should have only one set of elements, so immigration counsel can argue that there is no ambiguity and the noncitizen wins at Step One, before reaching the Step Two record of conviction analysis. These would include offenses with a scienter element less than "specific intent, deliberateness, willfulness, or recklessness."  (Id. at 687.) Examples include mens rea of mere negligence or strict liability, as well as forms of "recklessness" that amount to no more than gross negligence, and nearly all "regulatory offenses" punishing conduct not itself reprehensible other than being unauthorized.  (See Silva-Trevino, supra, at 689 n.1.)

Step Two: Traditional Modified Categorical Analysis. Silva-Trevino's Step Two consults the traditional record of conviction to see whether it contains "facts" that bring the conviction within the CMT ground of deportation, but only when the categorical analysis of Step One does not give a definitive answer to the CMT question: "where a statute encompasses both conduct that involves moral turpitude and conduct that does not (as evidenced by its application to the latter category in an actual case)."  (Silva-Trevino, supra, at 698.) The Attorney General held that the record of conviction should be consulted "in every case where (because the criminal statute in issue has at some point been applied to conduct that did not involve moral turpitude) the categorical analysis does not end the moral turpitude inquiry."  (Id. at 698-99.)

The record of conviction used here is the traditional one, limited to the traditional record of conviction. "Most courts, however, have limited this second-stage inquiry to the alien's record of conviction, including documents such as the indictment, the judgment of conviction, jury instructions, a signed guilty plea, or the plea transcript. See, e.g., Nicanor-Romero, 523 F.3d at 1007 ("We do not look beyond such documents ... to determine what particular underlying facts might have supported [the prior] conviction.")

25 For comprehensive collections of cases defining crimes of moral turpitude, see D. KESSELBRENNER & L. ROSENBERG, IMMIGRATION LAW AND CRIMES, Chapter 6 and Appendix C (2009); N. TOOBY, J. ROLLIN & J. FOSTER, CRIMES OF MORAL TURPITUDE (2008).
(internal quotation marks and citations omitted). In my view, when the record of conviction fails to show whether the alien was convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude, immigration judges should be permitted to consider evidence beyond that record if doing so is necessary and appropriate to ensure proper application of the Act's moral turpitude provisions." (Silva-Trevino, supra, at 698.) And Step Two is also so limited. Unlike the traditional record of conviction analysis, however, Silva-Trevino's inquiry does not stop here. Under the normal analysis, if the record of conviction does not establish that the conviction necessarily involved moral turpitude, then the government cannot sustain its burden of proof of deportability by clear and convincing evidence, and the court must conclude respondent is not deportable.

For example, some theft statutes, such as California's vehicular theft statute, can be violated with intent either to permanently or temporarily deprive the owner of the vehicle. Intent to permanently deprive would constitute moral turpitude. Joyriding, however, with intent only temporarily to deprive, however, does not constitute moral turpitude. If criminal defense counsel specifies, in the plea, that the conviction is for intent only temporarily to deprive, then the Step Two inquiry is conclusive. It absolutely specifies the conviction occurred under the non-CMT portion of the statute, and the respondent is not removable.

Similarly, a plea to burglary where the target offense is identified in the record of conviction as trespass (a non-CMT offense), cannot constitute a CMT, so the removal proceedings should be ordered terminated at Step Two, without proceeding to Step Three.

These results should be unchanged, since the Step Two record of conviction analysis does not have an inconclusive result in such a case. It is only where the normal record of conviction documents reaches an “inconclusive” result that the Silva-Trevino analysis proceeds to Step Three.

Step Three: Consideration of Any Other Evidence Necessary and Appropriate. Under Silva-Trevino, if the record of conviction is inconclusive, the immigration court proceeds to Step Three: "In my view, when the record of conviction fails to show whether the alien was convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude, immigration judges should be permitted to consider evidence beyond that record if doing so is necessary and appropriate to ensure proper application of the Act's moral turpitude provisions." \(\text{(Id. at 699.)}\) "The sole purpose of the [Step Three] inquiry is to ascertain the nature of a prior conviction; it is not an invitation to relitigate the conviction itself." \(\text{(Id. at 703 [footnote 3 omitted].)}\) This should apply to both the government and the respondent: neither party is allowed to contradict elements of the statute of conviction that were in fact adjudicated in the criminal case.

---

This new rule places great discretion in the hands of the Immigration Judge:

And where a party meets, or fails to meet, its burden of proof on an issue related to application of the Act's moral turpitude provisions based solely on the record of conviction and documentary evidence, the immigration judge need not consider additional evidence or testimony except when and to the extent he or she determines that it is necessary.

\(\text{(Id. at 703 [footnote 4 omitted].)}\) In other words, the Immigration Judge can decline to hear evidence beyond the record of conviction if s/he finds it it is not "necessary" or "appropriate" to do so, and in that case, where the Step Two record of conviction remains inconclusive, the party with the burden of proof loses.

The moral turpitude question left open to proof by necessary and appropriate evidence in Step Three is a narrow one. Categorical analysis of the elements of the statute alone in Step One has not given a decision in favor of either party. Respondent has shown a realistic probability that this statute would be applied to conduct beyond the pale of moral turpitude by showing a single instance in which this was done. The Step Two examination of the traditional record of conviction is likewise inconclusive, showing that the facts underlying the conviction might or might not have involved moral turpitude. Neither party may contest the elements of the statute, or the factors found true as part of the modified categorical analysis of the record of conviction. The remaining question is whether, within this narrow area, the defendant's conduct for which s/he was convicted \textit{in fact} involved moral turpitude.

This last question becomes in effect a conduct-based ground of removal, subject to proof by any "necessary and appropriate evidence" like any other fact on which removal depends. Percipient witnesses, including the respondent, can testify. Character evidence can be submitted to buttress the credibility of any witness, including the respondent, and evidence of respondent's character for a pertinent trait, e.g., honesty, can be submitted for the purpose of proving conduct in conformity with that trait on the occasion in question. Evidence of the bias of any witness can be offered. Objections can be offered to any evidence, on grounds of unreliability or fundamental unfairness. Counsel can also argue for the application of the Federal Rules of Evidence; while not currently binding, an Immigration Judge is certainly free to follow them in any given instance.
In a theft-type case, for example, in which the elements and record leave open the question whether the defendant intended to deprive the owner of the property permanently (CMT) or only temporarily (non-CMT), the respondent could submit any available evidence that his intent was merely the latter. Where a conviction can be had under an assault statute for mere negligence, respondent can submit evidence that his intent did not exceed the merely negligent.

If the inquiry becomes too burdensome, the Immigration Judge could decide that it is not "necessary or appropriate" to listen to 25 witnesses. What the court cannot do is listen only to the evidence of one side, and exclude pertinent evidence offered by the other. Due process also prohibits a tribunal from allowing one party to offer evidence on an issue, but precluding the other party from doing so.

Definition of Moral Turpitude. Silva-Trevino also stated: "To qualify as a crime involving moral turpitude for purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, a crime must involve both reprehensible conduct and some degree of scienter, whether specific intent, deliberateness, willfulness, or recklessness." (Id. at 687.)

A finding of moral turpitude under the Act requires that a perpetrator have committed the reprehensible act with some form of scienter. See, e.g., Partyka, 417 F.3d at 414 ("[T]he hallmark of moral turpitude is a reprehensible act committed with an appreciable level of consciousness or deliberation"); Wei Cong Mei v. Ashcroft, 393 F.3d at 740 ("[A] person who deliberately commits a serious crime is regarded as behaving immorally and not merely illegally") (emphases omitted); Michel v. INS, 206 F.3d 253, 263 (2d Cir. 2000) ("corrupt scienter is the touchstone of moral turpitude," hence the Board's "long-standing" rule that, "where knowledge is a necessary element of a crime under a particular criminal statute, moral turpitude inheres in that crime"). [FN5]

(Id. at 706.)

---

28 See Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470 (1973) (due process requires procedural rules to be even-handed in their application, striking down a state law requiring the defendant to produce discovery for the prosecution, but not vice versa).
29 Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95, 97, 99 S.Ct. 2150, 60 L.Ed.2d 738 (1979) (per curiam)(reversing sentence because trial court excluded testimony offered by the defense under Georgia's hearsay rules, but allowed the prosecution to introduce the same evidence in a codefendant's trial); Gray v. Klauser, 282 F.3d 633, 644 (9th Cir. 2002) (Idaho deprived petitioner of right to present a defense under Sixth Amendment when trial court used different standard for determining admissibility of hearsay statements from two dead victims. “A state rule or state judge may not without justification impose stricter evidentiary standards on a defendant . . . than it does on the prosecution.”).
This definition, according to the Attorney General, "encompasses and describes existing Board precedents classifying many different crimes . . . ." (Id. at 706 n.5.) It therefore does not purport to alter the actual definition of moral turpitude for immigration purposes.

To constitute moral turpitude, the offense must (1) be reprehensible, and (2) require sufficiently culpable mens rea, which includes (a) specific intent, (b) deliberation, (c) willfullness, or (d) recklessness. (Id. at 687.) Therefore, as with aggravated felony crimes of violence under Leocal, an offense with an element of mere negligence or strict liability cannot constitute a crime of moral turpitude.

Criminal defense counsel can select an incident that does not involve moral turpitude in its underlying facts as the incident to which to plead guilty. For example, if a person engaged in unauthorized access to a computer, and thereby obtained information, on two occasions in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(2)(C), one committed in January and the other in March, he might plead guilty to the initial violation if there was no CMT conduct underlying the conviction, and avoid the March violation in which he entered the computer of another and intentionally committed major damage. The government could not use conduct that underlay a March charge, when the defendant entered a plea to the January incident.

_Retroactivity Argument._ Immigration counsel can argue before the immigration courts that Silva-Trevino should not be applied retroactively to pleas that were entered before November 7, 2008, the date on which it was published. In Miguel-Miguel v. Gonzales, the Ninth Circuit held that Matter of Y-L, which held that drug trafficking is almost always a particularly serious crime, cannot be applied retroactively to a plea entered before its publication date, because Matter of YL announced a new substantive, definitional rule. St. Cyr also provides support for this argument.

_Back-up Positions._ Even though many defenses remain, it seems more likely that a given conviction will be found to be a CMT under the new rules. Therefore, it becomes even more important to consider post-conviction relief in the criminal courts at an early 31 A conviction does not constitute a crime of moral turpitude if the minimum intent required to commit the offense is criminal or gross negligence, defined as a lack of awareness of a substantial risk, unless the record of conviction shows noncitizen pleaded to a greater intent. _Matter of Perez-Contreras_, 20 I. & N. 615 (BIA 1992) (3d degree assault); _Matter of Sweetser_, 22 I. & N. Dec, 709 (BIA 1999) (child abuse); _Matter of B_, 2 I. & N. Dec. 867 (BIA 1947) (Canadian conviction for willfully damaging property not CMT, where “willfully” defined to include gross or wanton negligence).

---

32 _Miguel-Miguel v. Gonzales_, 500 F.3d 941, 947 (9th Cir. 2007).

34 _INS v. St. Cyr_, 533 U.S. 289, 121 S.Ct. 2271 (2001) (Congress will not be construed as intended to apply a new rule retroactively, to a plea entered prior to its publication, where to do so would disturb settled expectations, unless it speaks with unmistakeable clarity).
stage in removal proceedings, although fewer alternative dispositions may be safe under the Silva-Trevino analysis. If a conviction is vacated on grounds of legal invalidity, under Pickering, then there is no conviction-based CMT ground of removal. The government cannot go into the facts of the case to show a conviction is for a CMT if there is no conviction at all. Second, if the immigration court does conclude a conviction is a CMT, counsel should be prepared with arguments for relief from removal. Third, counsel can raise the many objections against the validity of the Silva-Trevino analysis on petition for review in the federal courts.

Conclusion. Hopefully, this decision will be vacated. If not, however, we may have to live with it. Using its own language, counsel can argue forcefully that its principles have equal application to both parties. Since due process requires procedural rules to be even-handed, respondents may indeed be able to win termination of proceedings at Step One, Step Two, or Step Three.

---